Charlie Chaplin Funnier Than Ever in Own New Film

Produces 'The Kid' After Year's Absence From Screen -Other Photo Plays.

This first product from the comedy king in a long, long time, which packed the Strand yesterday in record fashion with throngs who seemed ravenous for their Chaplin fare, seemed intended to make up in length for the aching void that had once been regularly filled by Chaplin, for its six reels were three times as long as his ordinary comedies, and the comic scenes were approximately four times as funny. That was because this film did not suffer in its humorous episodes, as have some of the earlier pictures written and produced by Chaplin, from those Ben-Ami pauses which frequently riled the customers. Even the lachrymose passages were commendably brisker and briefer, and one knew that the artistic pathos wasn't bathos, because the Chaplin feet never obtruded. This first product from the comedy

This release from the First National Exhibitors has some highly original touches, such as Chaplin's method of earning a livelihood as a glazier with the help of his adopted boy, who throws stones with the sure aim of a David, and this kid's fight with an older youngster and the proud foster parent's frantic efforts to make him lose it, so that the father won't have his own complexion knocked off by a rowdy. A good share of the success of the picture is due to Jackie Coogan, who for all the remarkable and unfeigned fidelity to childish expressions as the founding is still too young to be spoiled from being paired with Chaplin. This lad of five or six would have made an admirable Scntimental Tommy at the age when Tommy was clad in sexless garments.

The groundwork of the tale is conventional enough—that of a prima donna who discovers eventually that the boy was her own castoff child—and Miss Edna Purviance never suggested a grand opera diva even when she wept spontaneously. And Chaolin, who has now reached the peak where he must be treated as the chief feature of a programme, ought to be able to dispense with one vulgar scene which mars the million dollars might afford to eliminate such gutter buffoonery. The picture, besides being his most interesting and versatile to date, also is his most human, the only extravagant note being struck in a ludderous dream of heaven, at the This release from the First National

"Just Out of College" at Capitol.

The Goldwyn version of George Ade's story, "Just Out of College," shown with Jack Pickford at the Capitol yesterday, is pleasant to the view, its one fault being that it came after "It Pays to Advertise." Just as in that story, a young graduate sets out by devious advertising methods to Cuble in thirty days the $20,000 his prospective fathering in the development of the pickle trade but the winning of a girl. Lack of good acting by some of the minor characters fails to give plausibility to several incidents, and the honesty of the business methods of selling a man his own pickles methods of selling a man his own pickles methods of selling a man his own pickles contents of interest—but it's dollars to pickles George Ade didn't write the titles.
